A STRONG GOVERNMENT.

We find many fair minded men receive the terms nation and national with favor because they have vague ideas that they will give more strength to the general government. We all pray that Union may stand forever. But it is a fatal error to suppose that the strength of a government grows out of the amount and not the beneficence of its power. There is truth which governs best-that which gives the largest measure of freedom, rights of conscience, of persons and of property. That government is the most enduring which lifts up its citizens into a sense of the rights and duties of their positions; which trains them to watch and guard the public welfare; which makes them bold, free, and enterprising, and imbues them with the proud teeling that government belongs to them and not they to government. Let us turn our eyes from this system which thus gives strength and duration to the despotisms of the world where all jurisdictions are in the hands of monarchs, upheld by all the pow-
